Overview

Where can I see the Northern Lights in Reykjavik?

At Perlan, reached by Reykjavik's Hop On, Hop Off sightseeing bus, the Áróra show uses 8K projection and surround sound showcases breathtakingly cinematic footage of the Northern Lights within a 150-seat planetarium. We Icelanders are used to seeing the Northern Lights and have plenty of advice to help you ensure your aurora quest is successful.

When are the Northern Lights most visible in Iceland?

The Northern Lights are most visible between September and April when Iceland experiences long, dark nights. During the winter solstice, Iceland experiences only three and a half hours of daylight. This means your probability of seeing aurora increases significantly.

Why should you visit the Northern Lights in Iceland?

There are many advantages to seeing the Northern Lights in Iceland, such as the abundance of dark places far from anywhere impacted by light pollution. If you live in a more densely populated area, it's hard to be able to get far enough away from towns and cities to be able to escape the distant glow of lights and find somewhere really dark.

What is the aurora borealis in Iceland?

Whether it's your first time or you're a returning visitor, this is everything you need to know to experience the Aurora Borealis in Iceland. What Are the Northern Lights?

(And Why 2025 Is a Big Deal) Think of the aurora as a solar wind storm hitting Earth's magnetic shield. The sun is constantly firing off charged particles.
